Short History of Slovene Literature

By F. T. SUHADOLNIK

OTON ZUPANCIC

The real reformer of Slovene poetry was Oton Zupancic, who was born at Vinic, January 23, 1878. In 1888 he entered the gymnasium at Novo Mesto where he completed the lowest classes; later he went to the city of Ljubljana where he completed his collegiate courses in 1898 and went to Vienna to study history and geography. In 1903 he was substitute teacher in the gymnasium in Ljubljana after which he left the country and taught for some years outside of his own country. For a short time he even lived in Paris. When Askerc died, Oton Zupancic became the archiver at Ljubljana. In 1914 he was the editor of the "Slovan", in 1917 he was the editor of the "Ljubljanski Zvon."

Zupancic was in his sixth year of studies when his first poem 'Beli Kranjc' was published in the Vrtec and which in the following year was renamed "Smiljan Smiljanifi." In the same year, 1894, "Dom and Svet" published one of the poems from the cycle "Gojka." Zupancic remained a faithful contributor to the "Dom and Svet" until 1898 while his poems appeared continually in the "Vrtec" until 1900. In 1896 the "Ljubljanski Zvon" published his National Folk Song "Da sem jaz ptičiča,, kam bi zletela?" (Were I a bird, where would I fly?).

The poems of the students poet, Zupancic, are of especial note because of the lovely content. In the first place all of his poems are for children, because of their simple and meodious rythmn and because of the characteristic rythmn free from all pedentry. He learned most from the folk songs of his native place, from the Serb folk songs and from the Ukraninian dumas which he became acquainted from Dr. J. E. Krek whom he visited on many occasions while he was at school. Influences n rythmn can be traced to Levstik while the oriental themes for some of his songs are plainly the influence of Askerc.

When Zupancic came to Vienna he gradually came to another path that led to a completely different world. In Vienna he began to know big city life and especially the large city poetry; the French symbolism of Verlaine and Maeterlinck. As early as 1897 these influences can be seen in the contributions to the "Ljubljanski Zvon" by the freerer composition of verses and stanzas. Characteristically modernly symbolical are the poems of the next few years, especially the "Zimski Zarki" (Winter Junshine) with their absinthe environment expressed with a forceful narrative style which is noted in his metaphors and with surprising personifications and the symbolism expressed in free verse. Rhyming, which Zupancic never completely forgot were used without any reason, are very often dependent upon only the final letter "u" or "a" but used nevertheless with surprisin; effects in expressing full felt emotionalism.

Immediately after Cankar published his "Erotica," Zupancic published his "Casa opojnosti" (Intoxicating Cup). Even the name with its French decadence atmosphere announced that the poems contained therein are of a newer and very modern. The poems themselves affirm the impression gained from the title. Style, foreign rythmn, the introduction of the seguidylls with the symbolic treatment, new metaphors expressing phrases such as: brezpoldne ure (non-noonhours), bolne rože (sick flowers), and the epigram for the critics to whom he dedicates the book, whom he accuses of "having heads of grey hair and hoary examples." The characteristics of "the decadence"-modern thought, lively eroticism, the cynicism, the cultural-battling disposition, and the sickly dreaminess reminding one of Heine and Carducci-are in the main characteristics also of Zupancic's poetry in the tempest era of his "Cup." In his contact with the Slovene folk songs, Zupancic was saved from the complete influences of the "decadence" with its poetry without form and self imposed moral nihilism. His continuous cry from the "midnight darkness," the "winter's gloom," from "aimless path-" is always hopeful filled with an ethical hope for light, "morn," for the holy, pure happiness of hildish inno-

Already in the collection "Intoxicating Cup" in the part he chose to call 'Morn' he collected some poems for children, most of them new. Soon after he collected his best poems for children from the "Vrtec," "Angelicek" and the "Dom in Svet" to which he added some from the "Casa Opojnosti" he dedicated to Slovene children as an Easter present in the year 1900, under the title "Pisanice". Among the poems in this collection can be found the real gems of Slovene poetry: "Snegulcica" (Snow Drop), "Kangljica" (Water Jug), "Pripovedka o nosku (Tales of the Small Nose), "Ajda Barčiča" (The Small Ship) etc.

The following volumes of poems, published under the symbolic title "Cež plan" (Across the Plain) shows Zupancic on the way from the midnight darkness to light and "day." The vibrations of the stormy past are still evident in the tremblings which he shows in the pression, "Sell yourself to the winds, blow they " they may; Let the heart shout and cry itself out in g But the poet felt all through the tempest of emotions a passions a real need for the orientations to the real and ethical paths "even though the greatest part of day is lost": "Nevertheless the mariner takes his ings with the noon day sun." Already in a cycle of poems published under the title "Manom Josipa Muri dedicated to the memory of his fast poet friend, Joseph Murn the orientation begins to show itself. In a desp ing plea of the first poem "Grobovi tulijo" (The Gran Howl) he claims that the memory of his friend op the "secret to death and life" he made a plea that that consciousness is the hope of ressurection from a of errors to a life of renewed work. The forms pancic's poems become very much more quiet clearer and individual. He evidences the return simple and loveliness of his former folk songs. popularity of "Cez plan" is seen from the fact in 1911 together with the "Casa opojnosti" was rep in the year of 1911.

As a maute artist with the broad worldy ho and ripened force shows himself in the collection poems "Samogovori" (Monologues) published in At this time he has ridded himself of all foreign ences, the content of his poems becomes deeper more thoughtful, the spirit lords over the emotions momentary feelings. His poems enjoy in showing self and his outlook upon the world, on the prowhich interest men and the Slovene national pro-The poems in which this is evident are: "Sfinga Sphinx), "Prebujenje" (Awakening), (With the Train)), and especially Duma which of the most forceful poems in the Slovene language

A MENU SUGGESTION
