CLEVELAND INDIANS

CLEVELAND, Ohio — With the major league baseball season just one third gone, it's much too early to make any predictions regarding the winners of various honors in most classifications.

However, it's fairly certain that when the 1956 season is concluded, laurels for the comeback of the year will go to the Cleveland Indians' first sacker, Vic Wertz. In fact, many baseball followers including members of the press who are usually polled on such matters at the conclusion of the season, have prematurely gone on record as designating Wertz the "Comeback Man of 1956."

Thrice benched by injuries last season—one of his periods of inactivity lasting a month—Wertz was a most dejected person last August when the doctors informed him that he was suffering from infantile paralysis. From the moment that he knew he was a victim of polio, Wertz announced that the disease was just putting a temporary crimp in his career.
